Skills

1.Introduction to Skill Development:

Skill defines it as the ability to carry out a task with predetermined results often within a given amount of time, energy, or both. Skills can often be divided into domain general and domain-specific skills. For example, in the domain of work, some general skills would include time management, teamwork and leadership, self-motivation and others, whereas domain-specific skills would be useful only for a certain job. Skill usually requires certain environmental stimuli and situations to assess the level of skill being shown and used.

2. Type of Skills:

Skills can be categorized in two heads i.e. soft skill and hard skills.

I.Soft Skills: Soft skills are a combination of interpersonal people skills, social skills, communication skills, character traits, attitudes, career attributes and emotional intelligence quotient (EQ) among others that enable people to effectively navigate their environment, work well with others, perform well, and achieve their goals with complementing hard skills. The Collins English Dictionary defines the term "soft skills" as “desirable qualities for certain forms of employment that do not depend on acquired knowledge: they include common sense, the ability to deal with people, and a positive flexible attitude.”

a) People skills: These skills are patterns of behaviour and behaviour interactions, among people; it is an umbrella term for skills under three related set of abilities: personal effectiveness, interaction skills, and intercession skills. This is an area of exploration about how a person behaves and how they are perceived irrespective of their thinking and feeling. It is further elaborated as dynamics between personal ecology (cognitive, affective, physical and spiritual dimensions) and its function with other people's personality styles in numerous environments (life events, institutions, life challenges...etc.). British dictionary defines People skills as "the ability to communicate effectively with people in a friendly way, especially in business" or personal effectiveness skills. In business it is a connection among people in a humane level to achieve productivity

b) Social skills: A social skill is any skill facilitating interaction and communication with others. Social rules and relations are created, communicated, and changed in verbal and nonverbal ways. The process of learning these skills is called socialization. For socialization, Interpersonal skills are essential to relate one another. Interpersonal skills are the interpersonal acts a person uses to interact with others which are related to dominance vs. submission, love vs. hate, affiliation vs. aggression, control vs. autonomy categories (Leary, 1957). Positive interpersonal skills include persuasion, active listening, delegation, and stewardship among others. Social psychology is the academic discipline that does research related to social skills, the discipline studies how skills are learned by an individual through changes in attitude, thinking, and behaviour.

c) Communication skills: Communication skill or communication skills may refer to:

- Rhetoric, the facility of speakers or writers to inform, persuade, or motivate particular audiences
- Communication, the activity of conveying information through speech, writing, or other behaviour
- English studies, an academic discipline that studies the English language

d) Life skills: These skills are the abilities for adaptive and positive behaviour that enable humans to deal effectively with the demands and challenges of everyday life; in other words, psychosocial competency. They are a set of human skills acquired via teaching or direct experience that are used to handle problems and questions commonly encountered in daily human life. The subject varies greatly depending on social norms and community expectations but skills that functions for well-being and aid individuals to develop into active and productive members of their communities are considered as life skills.

II. Hard Skills: Hard skills are specific, teachable abilities that can be defined and measured, such as typing, writing, math, reading and the ability to use software programs.

Hard skills are any skills relating to a specific task or situation. These skills are easily quantifiable unlike soft skills which are related to one's personality. As a part of skill development, a major focus of the government and enterprises has been development of Hard Skills. Hard skills are often referred as job skills. When we talk about Skill Development in India or any part of the world, it is mainly related to the development of Job Skills. Development of hard skills is advocated as it makes the people selfsustained & self-efficient. The following sections deals with the skill development throw more light to the hard skills concept and its relevance for the development of any country.

III. Skills for Business:

Business or Management skills: A manager's job is varied and complex, so they need certain skills to perform the duties and activities associated with being a manager. Robert l. Katz concluded that manager needs three essential skills. They are

i. Technical skill.

ii. Human skills.

iii. Conceptual skills.

- i) Technical skills: These are job knowledge and techniques needed to perform specified tasks. These skills tend to be more important for lower-level manager because they use tools and techniques to produces organisational product or services.
- ii) Human skills: involve the ability to work while with other people individually and in group. As the manager directly deal with the people, these skills are essential and equally important at all level of management i.e. top, middle and lower level managers. Manager who are with good human skills know how to communicate, motivate, lead and inspire enthusiasm and trust.
- iii) Conceptual skills: are the skills managers use to think and to conceptualize about the abstract and complex situation. Using these skills, wherein manager must see the organization as a whole. These skills are most important at the top level management.

Personality Development

1 .Introduction to Personality Development:

- Personality is the combination of characteristics that capture the unique nature of a person as how he reacts and interacts with others in the environment, and a set of physical and mental characteristics that reflect how a person thinks, acts, looks, and feels. Personality is the organized pattern of behaviours and attitudes that makes a person distinctive. It occurs by the constant interaction from their environment. "Personality is the dynamic organization within the individual of those psychophysical systems that determine his characteristics behaviour and though" (Allport, 1961).
- Personality development means enhancing and grooming one's outer and inner self to bring about a positive change in one's life. Each individual has a distinct persona that can be developed, polished and refined. This process includes boosting one's confidence, improving communication and language speaking abilities, widening one's scope of knowledge, developing certain hobbies or skills, learning fine etiquettes and manners, adding style and grace to one's persona, and overall imbibing oneself with positivity, and liveliness. It helps one realize self-capabilities and strengths making one a stronger, happier and cheerful person. The change is affected in the pattern of thoughts, feelings, and behaviours which distinguishes the individual. The field of personality psychology holds that personality emerges early and continues to change throughout an individual's lifespan. Hence it can be developed in meaningful ways.

2. Factors Influencing Personality Development

Personality traits are influenced by genetic, environmental, transactional, and stochastic factors. In the process of growth and development individual develop unique structure of traits which lead to individual differences. Thus, personality formation is a complex process, depending upon common and unique experiences on the one hand, and, genetic factors on the other. Genetic factors consider heredity as a major determinant of the development of personality of an individual takes place in a socio-cultural context.

- Genetics- The heritability of a trait may change depending on an individual's environment and/or life events. Thus genetic and environmental influences on personality differ depending on other circumstances in a person's life.

- Environmental - The Non shared environmental effects like different work, marital, and family experiences are associated with personality change, and by the impact of major positive and negative life events on personality.

3. Personality Development Standards

Standards Personality development is just not physical development, but it includes more of inner mental development beyond grooming a presentable exterior.

- Try to be always polite and bring smile to your face: It is essential to always react as per the situation demands. Being polite can highly work in your favour rather than showing harshness, which might create a bad impact. To tackle any kind of situation you need to react in a calm and decent manner. A smiling face can put forward some respectful attitude.

Have positive attitude towards life: Being positive in life makes environment positive for you and always work in your favour.

Because, positive or negative vibes around you might affect work. This is an important part of personality development as your positive attitude towards life might inspire others person to have same kind of attitude.

Enjoy the work you do: Enjoy the work you do in order to bring positive energy in life. This is the crucial part of personality development. If you are not having fun while carrying out your work then it would not make you feel happy. Ultimately if you are not happy, it won't assist in personality development. So try to "Do the work that you enjoy".

• Learn some good etiquette: Presenting yourself in a well decent manner makes you noticed. Good etiquettes are all about being well mannered person in life. Good etiquettes involve proper shake hand, table manners, polite language, body language, etc and this creates great impact on your personality development.

• Good command over language: The way you speak and what you speak are two different aspect which assists in analyzing your personality. You need to have good command over English language in order to successfully carry out various objectives. "Talk sensibly, talk conspicuously"!

• Don't be monotonous: A dynamic appearance includes everything from proper dressing sense to behaviour pattern. Break the monotony in situation making it interesting and happening so that you can bring in charm near to your surroundings.

4. Developing Personality Development Attributes

Body Language: Your body language tells a lot about how you feel and how you react to certain situations. Your personality development is somewhat dependent on how you will portray yourself to those around you. You might feel like you have a firm grasp of your own reality or what makes you tick, but your body language might let you down in this regard. Your body language takes its cues from your subconscious. If your subconscious is programmed to act in a specific way but you are trying to hide how you really feel through conscious expressions then you are lying to yourself, if you assume that you aren't being read like a book.

Presentation Skills: Presentation requires some skills to be presented in the right manner. The delivery of the presentation requires the presenter to have everyone's attention. A key part of this planning is to research your presentation audience, since the more you know your audience, the more you can understand them and what their expectations might be.

Effective Public Speaking: Public speaking is one of the essential components of communication at large. Most of the times, it is a structured process where the speaker is giving a speech, to a group of people, and in the process informs, or influences the audience. Effective public speaking is also a skill that can be easily developed and with practice overcome the nervousness and fear of delivering a speech.

Developing Communication Skills:

Communication is one of the basic necessities in order to express what one feels and thinks. In today's fast-paced high-tech world, the devices of communication may have changed but the challenge is to still to make effective communication so as to be clearly understood. Therefore, improving your communication skills is essential and is required for overall personality development. Good communication not only strengthens the career prospects but also helps you to be clear and precise in your oral as well as written communication. Communication is also essential in bringing about smooth work flow, transparency and efficiency in an organization. Communication is a complex process involving a lot of intricacies, due to which, individuals face problems in expressing themselves clearly.

Building Business Relationships: As the world has become more and more mechanized and business-oriented, it is essential to have strong business relationships with customers. Research shows that even with the best products and business practices, still needs a strong relationship to succeed in the marketplace. As at the heart of every relationship is respect. For engaging with others, one needs to have respect for them, your peers, your competitors and your surroundings. This binds and helps in functioning of teams, partnerships and managing relationships.

Communication

- According to D.K. Mc Farland, "Communication may be broadly defined as the process of meaningful interaction among human beings. More specifically, it is the process by which meanings are perceived and understanding is reached among human beings."

- According to Koontz and O' Donnel, "Communication is an intercourse by words, letters, symbols or messages and is a way that one organisation member shares meaning and understanding with another."

Communication is a process through which an information, idea or opinion is transferred to more number of people. The essential element of communication is that the communicated information should be understood correctly and transferred in the right direction.

- The word 'communication' is derived from the Latin word Communis or Communicate, which means 'to make common'.
- 'To make common' means 'to share'.
- It means the sharing of thoughts, ideas and emotions between two persons. In other words, communication means exchange of ideas, thoughts, opinions, information, messages, feelings, emotions, etc.
- Business communication can take place between two individuals, or two Organisations. It can also take place between an individual and an organisation.

Features of Communication

1. Communication is the passing of information.
2. It is necessary for better performance of job.
3. A manager works through the co-operation of others.
4. One should communicate the policies, plans, programmes of management to the workers.
5. Communication ends only when it reaches the destination.

Type of Communication

a. Based on Level

i. Intrapersonal communication: It is the language used or thought internal to the communicator. Intrapersonal communication is the active internal involvement of the individual in symbolic processing of messages

ii. Interpersonal communication: It is the level in which communication channels are the medium chosen to convey the message from sender to receiver.

iii. Group communication: Refers to the nature of communication that occurs in groups that are between 3 and 12 individuals.

iv. Public communication: It's at the heart of our economy, society, and politics.

b. Based on Form/Medium Used

i. Verbal Communication: It means communicating with words, written or spoken.

ii. Non-verbal communication: It includes using of pictures, signs, gestures, and facial expressions for exchanging information between persons.

iii. Meta Communication: Here the speaker choice of words unintentionally communicates something more than the actual words state.

iv. Formal Communication: A formal channel of communication can be defined as a means of communication that is formally controlled by managers or people occupying positions in an organisation.

v. Informal Communication: Side by side with formal channel of communication every organisation has an equally effective channel of communication that is the informal channel.

c. Levels of Direction

i. Downward Communication: The Communication that flows from Top to Bottom is known as downward communication.

ii. Upward Communication: The Communication that flows frombottom to top, which is from lower hierarchical level to higherlevel, is called Upward Communication.

iii. Lateral Communication: When communication takes place between two or more persons those who are working on thesame level, it is called lateral or horizontal communication.

iv. Diagonal Communication*:* Diagonal or Crosswise communication includes flow of information among persons at different levels who have no direct reporting relationships.

d. Based on Context

i. Organisational Communication: It is communication which gives life to the organisation; so, it can be likened to the life blood of an organisation. The communication system serves as the vehicle by which an organisation is embedded in its environment.

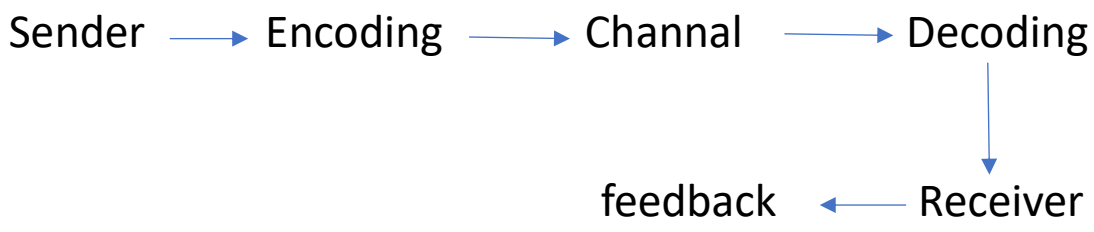
ii. Intercultural Communication: Intercultural communication refers to the communication between people from different cultures. According to Samovar and Porter, intercultural communication occurs whenever a message is produced by a member of one culture for consumption by a member of another culture, a message must be understood.

iii. Educational Communication: This type of communication relates to the field of education. It involves any type of communication flows, levels, systems that lead to acquisition and imparting of learning.

iv. Political Communication: Political communication is a field of communications that is concerned with political scenario in a country or communication that often influences political decisions and vice versa

Communication Process



Barries to Communications

- Barriers to communication are factors that block or significantly distort successful communication.
- Effective managerial communication skills helps overcome some, but not all, barriers to communication in Organisations.

1. Physical Barriers: this has to do with poor or outdated equipment used during communications, background noise, poor lighting, temperatures that are too hot or too cold.
2. Attitudes: emotions like anger or sadness can taint objectivity. Alsobeing extremely nervous, having a personal agenda or "needing tobe right no matter what" can make communications less than effective. This is also known as "Emotional Noise".
3. Language: this can seem like an easy one, but even people speaking the same language can have difficulty understanding each other if they are from different generations or from different regions of the same country. Slang, professional jargon and regional colloquialisms can even hurt communicators with the best intentions.
4. Physiological: ill health, poor eyesight, hearing difficulties and pain.
5. Problems with Structure Design: companies or institutions can have organization structures that are not clear, which can make communications difficult. Also to blame for faulty communicationsare bad information systems, and lack of supervision or training of the people involved.

6. Cultural Noise: people sometimes make stereotypical assumptionsabout others based on their cultural background.
7. Lack of Common Experience: it's a great idea to use examples or stories to explain a point that is being discussed. However, if the speaker and the audience cannot relate to these examples becausethey do not have the same knowledge or have not shared the sameexperiences then this tool will be ineffective.

Filtering

Filtering refers to a situation where sender manipulating information so it will be seen more favorably by the receiver. The major determinant of filtering is the number of levels in an organization's structure. The more vertical levels in the organization's hierarchy, the more will be the opportunities for filtering.

Selective Perception

Selective perception means seeing what one wants to see. The receiver, in the communication process, generally resorts to selective perception, i.e., he selectively perceives the message based on the organisational requirements, the needs and characteristics, background of the employees, etc.

Perceptual distortion is one of the distressing barriers to the effective communication.

Emotions

How the receiver feels at the time of receipt of information influences effectively how he interprets the information.

Language

Communicated message must be understandable to the receiver. Often, communication gap arises because the language the sender is using may be incomprehensible, vague and indigestible. Language is a central element in communication. It may pose a barrier to correct and timely action if its use obscures meaning and distorts intent.

Stereotyping

It is the application of selective perception. When we have preconceived ideas about other people. Stereotyping is a type of prejudice because what is on the outside is a small part of who a person is.

Status Difference

The organisational hierarchy poses another barrier to communication within the organisation, especially when the communication is between employee and manager.

Use of conflicting signals

A sender is using conflicting signals when he or she sends inconsistent messages. A vertical message might conflict with a non-verbal one.

Reluctance to Communicate

For a variety of reasons, managers are sometimes reluctant to transmit messages. The reasons could be:

a. They may doubt their ability to do so.
b. They may dislike – or be weary of – writing or talking to others.
c. They may hesitate to deliver bad news because they do not want to face a negative reaction.

When someone gives in to these feelings, they become a barrier to effective communications.

The Helo Effect

The term "halo effect" refers to the process of forming opinions based on one element from a group of elements and generalizing that perception to all other elements.

7Cs of Communication

To make communication more effective there are some essentials which we can use to increases the chance that the message is being interpreted exactly in the same way as it was intended.

1. Conciseness: A message should be brief and be able to say in the fewest possible words to save time.

2. Correctness: A message should be accurate to build credibility and confidence.

3. Concreteness: A message should be specific, definite, vivid rather than vague.
4. Clarity: A message should be clearly worded to make its comprehension easier.
5. Completeness: A message should contain all the facts and figures needed to make a decision.
6. Consideration: A sender should think and look from the receiver's point of view.
7. Courtesy: A sender should adopt a friendly and helpful manner to improve relationships.

4S f communication

1. Simplicity: A message should contain denotative words and be simple in nature to create an impressive outlook.
2. Shortness: A message should be short to be economical.
3. Sincerity: A sender must create a sincere, truthful conversation to make communication more effective.
4. Strength: A sender should believe in his message that he is about to transmit; it will give more strength in the process of communication.

VERBAL COMMUNICATION

In verbal communication, we make use of words in communicationprocess. The message is transmitted either with words spoken or written. It may consist of: -

Letters	- Speaking in Public
Emails	- Reading
Writing skills	- Telephonic Conversation
Chats	- Face to face interaction

NON- VERBAL COMMUNICATION:-

In non- verbal communication, a message is communicated with thehelp of pictures, signs, gestures and facial expressions between persons without making the use of words.

There are basically six components included in non- verbal communication

1. Paralanguage: When a message is communicated without the use of words but focuses on the way it is said, it is known to be paralanguage. Eg. 'um,' and 'hmm' or facial expressions, like a smirk, or gestures, like pointing.
2. Kinesis: When a message is communicated with the help of body movements and facial expressions, it is said to be as kinesics. It includes gestures, postures, adopters, emblems e.t.c .

3. Proxemics: Proxemics refers to the study of how space and distance influence communication. We only need look at the ways in which space shows upin common metaphors to see that space, communication, and relationships are closely related. Proxemics studies how people use theirphysical space. It is the study of what people communicate by standing closer, or farther away.
4. Chronemics : When a message is communicated on time, it also gives a clue about aperson how punctual he/she is and serious towards making a conversation.
5. Haptics: Haptics is the study of touching. Haptic communication is a branch of nonverbal communication thatrefers to the ways in which people and animals communicate and interact via the sense of touch. Touch is the most sophisticated and intimate of the five senses.
6. Oculesics: When a message is communicated with the help of eye contact, eye movements. Oculesics is one form of nonverbal communication, whichis the transmission and reception of meaning between communicatorswithout the use of words.

LISTENING

Practising good listening skills is an important part of succeeding in the workplace. Effective listening can help you interpret information accurately, form positive relationships and develop new skills. Understanding the types of listening and how to become a better listener can help you form effective communication habits and apply them in your professional life.

Listening skills contribute to your ability to accurately receive information when communicating with others. These skills are an important part of effective communication in the workplace. Developing good listening habits can help to ensure you understand the information correctly, interpret messages accurately and optimise your conversations and communications for efficiency.

Importance of Listening:

1. Building Relationships: Good listening can help you build and maintain positive relationships in the workplace. Showing interest when communicating with others can help you build trust and develop long-term, mutually beneficial professional relationships. Good listening can help you prevent misunderstandings between coworkers, perform your duties accurately and anticipate your customers' needs.

2. Learning New Skills: Effective listening is an important way to help you learn new skills. In order to accurately follow directions, it may be beneficial to develop skills and habits that contribute to the quality of your listening. By listening closely to the advice, guidance and directions of your mentors or supervisors, you may be able to learn new skills and advance your range of capabilities.
3. Performing Effectively: Listening intently can help you accurately follow directions. By following directions exactly, you may be able to improve your performance in the workplace. By listening closely to directions, guidelines and requirements, you may be able to avoid errors and improve your processes.

Types of Listening skills

1. Deep Listening: Deep listening occurs when you're truly committed to understanding the speaker's perspective and message. It includes paying attention to verbal and nonverbal cues to gain a full understanding of the speaker's experiences, thoughts, feelings, and objectives. This type of listening is especially useful when building relationships, establishing trust, and fostering rapport with coworkers, customers, clients, or vendors.

2. Full Listening: Full listening involves trying to fully comprehend the practical content of a speaker's message. This type of listening often involves active listening skills, like paraphrasing and asking clarifying questions. It can be particularly helpful when interpreting directions, learning new material, or developing new skills.
3. Critical Listening: Critical listening involves using logic and reasoning to separate opinion from fact when listening to a speaker's message. It usually involves using previous knowledge or experiences to identify factual content in communication. Critical listening can be especially important in professions that use persuasive speaking, debating, or investigatory skills.
4. Therapeutic Listening: Therapeutic listening is a more intimate type of listening that often involves receiving information from a speaker about their challenges or emotional situations. In the workplace, this type of listening is often an important part of succeeding in a career that deals with sensitive topics or emotional discussions. Therapists, doctors and counsellors often benefit from developing their therapeutic listening abilities.

How to practise active listening skills:

Active listening is a combination of techniques that include careful listening, observation and non-verbal clues. Below are seven skills that can help you improve your active listening abilities:

1. Limit distraction: An important part of active listening is limiting distractions so you can gather all the necessary information and details of your speaker's message. Limiting distraction could mean putting your phone away before entering into a conversation, having important conversations in a quiet, private space, or allowing yourself a brief pause to ensure you fully understand your speaker's message before responding.

2. Practice objectivity: Practising objectivity and ensuring you receive all information without bias can help you remain open to the messages and perspectives of your speaker. Even if you have a strong opinion about the topic of conversation, setting aside your opinions in order to receive your speaker's message without judgement can help you consider new possibilities and innovative perspectives.

3. Reflect: Reflecting refers to mirroring your speaker's message to convey that you understand their message. Reflecting can help assure speakers of your comprehension and can indicate your engagement in the conversation. This type of active listening skill can be especially helpful when engaging in therapeutic communication. For example, if your speaker says, "I'm tired of working late to make up for others who don't complete their tasks," you could say, "It sounds like you're feeling frustrated and overlooked."

4. Clarify: An important part of active listening is asking questions when you need clarification. Clarifying aspects of the conversation can indicate you're intently listening and provide you with an opportunity to confirm your understanding. To clarify, you may use specific, simple questions that require a "yes" or "no" as a response, or you may ask more general, open-ended questions that require more elaboration from your speaker.

5. Summarise: Restating key themes and summarising content is an effective skill that can contribute to your ability to practice active listening. In the workplace, summarising can help both parties confirm they understand the next steps and responsibilities. To summarise, consider offering a brief statement describing your speaker's primary message or key theme.

6. Use body language: Using body language to demonstrate your level of engagement is another important part of active listening. You can use your body language to indicate your understanding by nodding, making eye contact and responding with appropriate facial expressions. Body language may be especially important for professionals who use therapeutic listening to complete their daily duties.Read

7. Share: Sharing involves expressing your own thoughts, feelings and experiences to relate to your speaker. This active listening technique can help you contribute to the conversation and align expectations for the next steps, deliverables and responsibilities. You can also use sharing to offer suggestions for improvement, build trust and maintain positive workplace relationships.

8. Give your full attention: Distractions can make it difficult to focus on what a speaker is telling you. In order to become a good listener, limit as many distractions as possible and provide the speaker with your undivided attention. This includes silencing your phone, turning off your computer and avoiding the urge to multitask by checking emails or giving your attention to other tasks. This can help you focus on the speaker and make sure that you are taking in everything that they are saying. Managing your time correctly can also help you limit distractions while you are listening.

9. Pace the conversation

Being a good listener often includes opening a dialogue and allowing for a conversation to start between you and the speaker. Pace the conversation by determining the goal of the speaker's message and evaluating their body language to decide when it is appropriate for you to respond with your own input. Instead of rushing to fill silences, allow the speaker to finish their thoughts and acknowledge their message accordingly. This will also give you the time to absorb their message and process what they are saying before it is time for you to respond.

10. Ask meaningful questions: Once it is time to open up a dialogue, the questions you ask should be meaningful and establish your investment in the speaker's message. Ask questions that can help both you and the speaker reflect on what they said as well as elaborate any points that may need extra clarification. The questions might help the speaker remember other things they wanted to say or open up a new line of dialogue worth exploring.

Fundamentals of Listening:

Some fundamentals of good listening skills include:

- Active listening: Focus on what the speaker is saying, and try to understand their perspective.
- Empathy: Try to understand the speaker's feelings and situation, and imagine what they're experiencing.
- Non-verbal communication: Pay attention to the speaker's body language and facial expressions.
- Avoid interrupting: Let the speaker finish their point before asking questions.
- Ask questions: Ask open-ended questions to help the conversation flow.
- Avoid judgment: Don't jump to conclusions or impose your own opinions.
- Respond appropriately: Don't attack the speaker or put them down.

Listening is a fundamental part of communication and interpersonal relationships. It helps you process information, resolve conflict, and connect with others.